

Good Morning. I took my coffee and my camera out into the garden this morning. I wore my favourite sweater. It was lovely.

So you may have noticed that we've made a few changes around here (I don't know if you can read my blog through a feed but If you can and you do you should click through today). Rob started working on a new version of my website when I was in BC a few weeks ago. When I got home he had a test site ready and asked me to go through and make notes of any changes or additions I wanted. He finished it all up last night and replaced the old site.

My favourite part is the banner (and the photo Rob picked - it makes our backyard look awesome). I'll be able to add a couple more photos to it and it will cycle through them (or you can click on the arrows and chose the picture you want to look at). Pretty cool. Rob set up a Flickr connection too, so recent uploads to my Flickr account will show up in the side bar and you can click them for a better look. We've also got a new archive page and a better search tool to help you find things.

Another new addition is the To Do List page. I was inspired by Karyn of Make Something and her Crafty List of things To Do . I really liked the idea of having a page to keep track of big projects and goals (I also really like her title). As I complete things I'll be able to link back to the relevant post.